

CARSON DAILY APPEAL

Vol. 3.

CARSON CITY, NEVADA, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 7, 1873.

No. 77.

The Execution at Belmont.

D. M. Hall, convicted of the murder of John Copeland, alias Black Jack, in Belmont, last summer, was executed at that place on Friday last at 3 o'clock p. m. The gallows was erected about 400 yards from the town at a point between the grave yard and slaughter house. The doomed man was brought to the gallows shortly after one o'clock, and spent the interval of two hours smoking, speaking and listening to the spiritual consolations of the Episcopal minister of Belmont. From a hurriedly written account of the execution, we learn that nearly all the male inhabitants of the place, and some fifteen ladies, were present to witness the hanging, and that one of the latter allowed her sympathies in favor of the prisoner to become so demonstrative that she had to be checked by her friends. In his speech to the crowd, Hall did not protest that he was innocent, as in the case with most criminals, but contended that he was justified in what he did; that Black Jack as he called his victim had followed him from place to place, and that he was afraid of his life. He said that he could not have had a fair trial at Belmont, as he was a stranger to everybody there and no one knew or could know the relations existing between himself and his victim. He knelt on the scaffold and prayed, and seemed at peace with all mankind, forgiving all, but still thinking, or seeming to think, that he was justified in what he did. The arrangements on the scaffold were perfect, and the wretched man died without a struggle and apparently without pain, the physicians declaring that he died within five minutes after the drop fell. He is reported as a young and intelligent looking man, who came from Salt Lake to Pioche, and thence to Belmont. A few days prior to the execution, Sheriff Childwell opened a letter to Hall's address from a brother of his in Montana, asking for money with which to help him (the Montana brother) out of some trouble in which he had fallen.—Reveille Dec 1.
